SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

“He may as a last resort remove me from my position by the Guiteau method, but he cannot by threats or a display of the gun drive me away from the discharge of my duty,” said an internal revenue collector in June of 1883 of a district attorney incensed by charges the collector had made against him. The two men served the country during a particularly violent period in its history, one that had seen two of its presidents assassinated in the previous two decades. Faced with enforcing the laws, prosecuting offenders, and collecting taxes from a citizenry ravaged by the effects of the Civil War and its aftermath, public officials in the South operated in a parlous world that presented many obstacles to the successful discharge of their duties, including at times the personal or political antagonisms of officials with whom they had been charged to perform them.

This LexisNexis collection, Letters Received by the Attorney General, 1871–1884: Southern Law and Order, documents the efforts of district attorneys from southern states to uphold federal laws in the states that fought in the Confederacy and lie east of the Mississippi River. In this publication their correspondence with the attorney general is reproduced on microfilm, as are all other letters received by the attorney general from the states in question during that period, including the correspondence of marshals, judges, convicts, and concerned or aggrieved citizens.

The collection is organized in Source-Chronological Files, arranged by state of origin, judicial district, and the order in which the correspondence was received. Alabama occupies Reels 1–7; Florida, Reels 8–9; Georgia, Reels 10–15; Mississippi, Reels 16–19; North Carolina, Reels 20–22; South Carolina, Reels 23–31; Tennessee, Reels 32–35; and Virginia, Reels 36–39. Researchers interested in a given state can therefore easily find material on that state, although occasionally events in other states are referenced in the correspondence. The subject index found at the end of this guide lists the reels and frames where this additional material might be found.

While district attorneys in each state grappled with cases particular to their state, the problems they faced were often quite similar. Across the South, problems related to the enfranchisement of African Americans occupied the attention of most district attorneys. The late 1860s saw the development of organizations such as the Ku Klux Klan (KKK) to combat congressional Reconstruction. These groups opposed the granting of equal rights to African Americans and unleashed a reign of terror across southern states aimed at intimidating African Americans and white Republicans into not voting. As a response to the Klan, President Ulysses S. Grant signed legislation known as the Enforcement Acts in 1870 and 1871 that authorized law enforcement agents in the South to vigorously prosecute those infringing upon the newfound legal rights of African Americans.

In Alabama and South Carolina, in particular, election fraud and KKK violence were rampant. On repeated occasions, U.S. officials were forced to request troops in attempts to ensure fair elections. Election supervisors were accused of stuffing ballot boxes, and Republican candidates for Congress were prevented from speaking at political meetings and their audiences assaulted by groups of armed white men. U.S. attorneys, who were responsible for prosecuting these violators of the Enforcement Acts, did so at considerable risk to their own safety.

The collection includes documents pertaining to notable events such as the Ellenton race riots of 1876, which began when Democratic rifle clubs lynched an African American accused of assaulting a white woman and her son in South Carolina. In the fighting that ensued, a group of African Americans derailed a train carrying troops, and African American state legislator Simon Coker was killed by whites. He was one of over a hundred casualties of the tragedy.

Another event documented in some depth is the 1879 murder of Judge W. W. Chisholm in Kemper County, Mississippi. A prominent Republican, the judge was accused by resentful locals of having killed a Democrat. He allowed himself to be taken into custody along with his family. A hostile crowd broke into the jail in which he was housed and shot the judge along with his children.

These calamities were reflective of political divisions on a grander scale. The collection sheds light on constitutional crises in Alabama, where there existed two state legislatures for a time, and South Carolina, where two men claimed to be governor. Arguably the greatest electoral controversy in the nation's history, the hotly contested presidential election of 1876, receives particular attention in the file dedicated to South Carolina, where the results of the election were disputed and eventually decided by a congressional committee.

Beyond matters of race and politics, Letters Received by the Attorney General, 1871–1884: Southern Law and Order tracks the efforts of U.S. officials to prosecute violators of the nation's internal revenue laws, trespassers upon public lands, counterfeiters, and corrupt marshals. It includes documents that reveal how well or poorly prisoners were treated in a sometimes overburdened detention system. Comprising thirty-nine reels, the collection testifies to the great demands upon—and bureaucratization of—the nation's law enforcement branch during this tumultuous period in U.S. history.

SOURCE NOTE

All documents microfilmed for this edition of Letters Received by the Attorney General, 1871–1884: Southern Law and Order are from Record Group 60: Records of the Justice Department, Entry 55: Registers of Letters Received, and Entry 56: Source-Chronological File, held by the National Archives at College Park, Maryland.

EDITORIAL NOTE

This microfilm project consists of selected correspondence with attachments from the Justice Department's voluminous Source-Chronological File. Selection criteria included the date range of 1871–1884 and correspondence emanating from law enforcement officials in the following states: Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia. The Registers of Letters Received were included for each state. A very small number of documents have legibility problems. LexisNexis has made every technical effort to ensure legibility.
